‘Suspect’ is an editorial category used on the website.

What duties does the source mention?

According to the editorial team, Shlenskaya was born on 28 July 2000 in Moscow. The source claims that she headed the HR department, was involved in recruiting staff for vacancies, and organised the maintenance of personnel files and the recording of working hours. The same article mentions a service office which, according to the source, supported two call centres dealing with HR and administrative matters.

The HR function within such an organisation leaves specific traces — job vacancies, invitations to interviews, timesheets or employment contracts. These can be used to verify whether Shlenskaya had direct responsibility for the recruitment or vetting of candidates, and on behalf of which employer she may have been acting. No such records bearing her name have been found in the available publications.

The version regarding her previous employment

The editorial source also claims that Shlenskaya previously worked for an organisation linked to Yakov Kesselman. The original description does not specify the name of the legal entity, her position or the period of this employment. OCCRP wrote about Kesselman and the Milton Group in an investigation into a Kyiv call centre. The investigation allows for verification of the public context, but it does not contain any information regarding Shlenskaya’s employment. [1]

Where are the source documents required?

To verify her specific role in human resources, it is important to establish where a particular vacancy was advertised, who posted it, who processed the applicant’s paperwork, and at which office the applicant started work. This information would make it possible to cross-reference HR decisions with dates and employers. The public statement regarding the December operation in Moscow describes joint actions by the FSB and the Ministry of Internal Affairs, but does not mention Shlenskaya. There is no personal link to a specific incident in the published statement. [2]
